

Alameda County FAQ

Emergency Eviction Protections

In response to the Covid-19 pandemic, the County of Alameda Board of Supervisors enacted sweeping tenant protections, stopping nearly all evictions throughout the county. Please read this FAQ for more detailed information about these protections and contact a legal services provider for advice specific to your situation.

Note: This FAQ was updated July 1, 2020 to reflect recent changes to the Alameda County Eviction Moratorium. Prior versions of this document may exist and contain outdated information.

1. Can I be evicted in Alameda County during the Covid-19 (Coronavirus) pandemic?

Most evictions are not lawful in Alameda County during the moratorium period.

In Alameda County, the Board of Supervisors created new protections known as a moratorium, or a temporary suspension of evictions. The moratorium states that nearly all evictions in Alameda County are stopped temporarily. That means in most cases it is not lawful for a landlord to serve a tenant with an eviction notice or file an eviction lawsuit. Currently, the moratorium period lasts from March 24, 2020 until September 30, 2020, but it is possible the protections will be extended. If a tenant already received an eviction notice and the period of days specified in the notice had not yet expired, but it will expire during the moratorium period, eviction is also prohibited.

The only exceptions to the eviction prohibition is if a tenancy creates an imminent threat to health or safety, if a court or government agency has ordered that the property be vacated, or if the landlord is seeking to permanently remove the property from the rental market. In those cases, a landlord may file an eviction lawsuit, but is still required to follow the formal eviction process. However, even in these situations the tenant still may not need to move out and should contact a legal services organization for advice.

In California, a landlord can only evict a tenant after giving the tenant a written notice to move out and then filing a lawsuit and getting a court order if the tenant does not move out. Landlords must follow this same legal process during the Coronavirus pandemic.

2. I can't pay rent right now. How am I protected?

Under the Alameda County Moratorium, you cannot be evicted if you are unable to pay rent from March 24, 2020 to September 30, 2020 because of a loss of income or substantial medical expenses that were caused by COVID-19 or the effects of the crisis. Although any rent you do not pay will become a debt that your landlord may collect through collections or small claims court, you will have at least 12-months to repay this debt (discussed below) and you cannot be evicted in the future for rent that went unpaid during this time period.

Additionally, it is currently unlawful for a landlord to give a tenant an eviction notice for most reasons, including failure to pay rent. If you receive a notice claiming nonpayment for this time-period it is likely invalid. This protection applies to rent due from March 24, 2020 through September 30, 2020. It is possible the protections will be extended to apply to rent payments due after the current expiration date.

3. Do I need to prove I can't pay rent because of Covid-19?

Yes. Most tenants will have 12 months to repay their back rent, but only if they give some proof to their landlord showing that they couldn't pay rent because of the crisis. You could use one of these types of documentation:

- A letter from an employer or other source of income, citing Covid-19 as a reason for reduced work hours, termination, or other substantial reduction in pay;
- Employer paycheck stubs showing a reduction in pay following the Covid-19 lockdown;
- Bank statements showing a reduction in income following the Covid-19 outbreak;
- Documentation showing substantial out-of-pocket medical expenses caused by Covid-19;
- Documentation showing school or childcare closures that affect your working hours; or
- A sworn statement by you attesting to your loss of income, including facts to show your loss and stating that you are not able to gather the other documentation.

4. By when do I need to prove I can't pay rent because of Covid-19?

A tenant must provide proof to their landlord either within 45 days of the landlord asking for proof, or within 30 days of the local health emergency ending - whichever is later.

A tenant who provides proof must also be able to prove later on that they gave this information to their landlord, in case their landlord challenges it in court. For this reason, it is not advisable to send your documentation by regular mail. Tenants should send proof by certified mail or email. Tenants should ask their landlords to acknowledge that they received documentation. You may want to consult an attorney to make sure you are providing proof correctly while also protecting your privacy. Your landlord does not have the right to demand that you disclose private financial or medical information in order for you to qualify for these protections.

5. Does that mean I don't have to pay my rent?

Tenants still owe rent that becomes due during the moratorium, but if they follow the steps questions 3 and 4 (see above) they will have 12-months of when the rent became due to pay it back to the landlord. And as discussed above in question 2, a landlord cannot evict for failure to pay this rent, even after the 12-month repayment period. It is important to note that a landlord will be able to collect the rent as any other consumer debt.

Whether or not you pay rent right now is a personal matter that depends on what choices and resources you and your family have available to you. You may want to ask your landlord if you can pay a reduced amount of rent during the crisis if you still have some income, but because tenants' protections are strong under the Alameda County Moratorium, you should not sign onto a payment plan before speaking with a legal services provider.

6. Should I sign up a payment plan with my landlord?

Tenants should try to speak to a legal services provider before agreeing to a payment plan with their landlord. This is because under the Alameda County Moratorium, many tenants who give notice to their landlords about their inability to pay rent cannot be evicted for nonpayment of rent. As such, some landlords may try to convince tenants to sign unfair payment plans to circumvent these protections.

7. My city has also passed protections. Am I protected by the city or the county?

The county protections apply to tenants who live in cities as well as unincorporated areas of Alameda County. If a city has passed stronger protections than those in the county's moratorium, the city can choose to opt out of county protections, but at this time no city has done this. If you have questions about your city, call a legal services provider. If you live in Oakland, which passed stronger protections than the county, this may apply to you, if the City of Oakland takes action to opt out. An explanation of the protections passed in Oakland is available here.

8. How long do the protections last?

The moratorium is currently set to expire September 30, 2020, but it is possible the protections will be extended. For updates on the status of the moratorium and advice specific to your situation, please contact a legal services organization (see question 13).

9. Can my landlord take me to court?

Under state law, if your landlord files an eviction lawsuit against you, even if the lawsuit is not for a legally valid reason, you still have to respond in time in order to protect your rights. If you are served with an eviction lawsuit (documents called a summons and complaint), you should contact a legal aid organization immediately.

10. My landlord raised my rent. Do I have to pay the increase?

The Attorney General's office has stated that if a landlord raises a tenant's rent above 10 percent during the statewide state of emergency, or evicts a tenant and then raises the rent by more than 10 percent, it may be unlawful price gouging, which is subject to criminal penalties.

If you live in a city that has rent control or your tenancy is subject to the statewide rent caps (under a law called AB-1482), you may have additional protection from large rent increases. Unfortunately, there are currently no special protections against rent increases for Alameda County, although some cities have passed their own temporary protections.

11. Did Governor Newsom pass an eviction moratorium in California?

No, Governor Newsom did not issue an eviction moratorium. On March 27, he issued an order on evictions that we think is deeply unhelpful to tenants. The order does not extend the time for any tenant to pay rent or make them more likely to win an eviction case.

12. Who advocated for the Alameda County eviction moratorium?

A number of different legal services and other community based organizations advocated for the moratorium, including the following groups:

Centro Legal de la Raza, the East Bay Community Law Center, Bay Area Legal Aid, Eden Renters Union, The Hayward Collective, RISE Coalition, East Bay Housing Organizations, Alliance of Californians for Community Empowerment, La Familia, Faith in Action East Bay, UAW Local 2865 - Berkeley Unit, Resources for Community Development, Friends of Adeline, Berkeley Tenants Union, Legal Services for Prisoners with Children, and All Of Us Or None.
